New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo said last week that former Vice President Joe Biden has the “best case” for the Democratic nomination for president in 2020. Cuomo made the comments after delivering his inaugural address for a third term as governor on Ellis Island. The news was surprising to many New York political watchers not because of the endorsement of Biden, who has not said whether he will run in 2020, but because many believed County Legislator Virginia Perez has always marched by the beat of her own drum. She was elected to the County Board after her upset victory over then-Legislator Jose Alvarado in 2011 in a democratic primary for the County Board in the 17th District of Southwest Yonkers. Perez ran after the murder of her brother, who was killed delivering food in a Yonkers housing project. Since then, Perez has fought off democratic challenges in 2013, 2015 and 2017. When newly-elected Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi held her first news conference, standing next to her was Westchester Congresswoman Nita Lowey. Pelosi also joined with her other long-time democratic colleague, Westchester Congressman Eliot Engel, for his swearing in as chair of the Foreign Relations Committee.

The Royal Hanneford Circus has returned to the Westchester County Center for another set of shows coming in February, with animal rights groups upset that nothing has been done in county government to ban the circus from performing in a county-owned building, or anywhere in Westchester. Kiley Blackburn, founder of Animal Defenders of Westchester (ADOWorg), said her organization has been trying since 2004 to get action from county government to ban the circus in Westchester, and the alleged animal abuse that comes with it. “You can travel 50 miles in any direction from Westchester and the circus is banned,” she said. “They have banned it in New York City, in New Jersey and in two cities in Connecticut. It’s a disgrace that here in Westchester, the circus continues. We have received no action from county government. All it would take is an ex-creative order. He also said that he is aware of the "lot of hate" that surrounds the Board of Legislators.

ADOW did not make any attempts to get former County Executive Rob Astorino to issue the executive order because, as an animal rights supporter told us: "Look, if Astorino was giving all the credit at the County Center, we didn’t think he would think the circus. Our focus for more than 15 years has been to try and get something from the Board of County Legislator."

New York State recently passed the Elephant Protection Act, banning circus elephants from performing in the state, effective this year.

"Circuses with wild animal acts are inhumane, outdated and, for very good reasons, finally being banned," wrote Westchester resident Rebecca Sunshine in a letter to our papers last year. "Elephants are highly intelligent, social animals who never signed up for this. They are kept out of their natural environment, painfully prodded with bullhooks, and continued and transported in terrible conditions. Animals should never be mistreated and abused for the sake of our entertainment, and it is quite unfortunate that the Hamden Circus is still permitted to perform in Westchester County."

Blackman also expressed her frustration in a letter to our papers last year, saying: "Why do we need to use such a magnificent animal—so long and so stupid, without tricks—like the heartbreaking value of elephants running to help their friend who’s fallen off a circus platform? With how many years, do you think that an elephant actually lives more than an hour of people pinning a hammer and laughing at them? Look beyond the popcorn. Thank heaven we are evolving toward a society that can’t mistreat and abuse. "I truly believe the world, but not fast enough in Westchester.

Don't express sorrow over your sad lost animal and express your anger over these acts. Don't express sorrow over your sad lost business; when overhead and cost are factors, the Board of Legislators."" If you are against the Board of Legislators."
